

LUDLOW HALL OPENED

For the editors, the publication of each issue of the UNB Law Journal is a special occasion. But none has been more special than this—the issue commemorating the opening of Ludlow Hall, the new law building named after New Brunswick's first Chief Justice.

In 1892 the faculty of law was established in Saint John as a part of King's College. After King's College relocated in Halifax in 1923, the school remained in Saint John as a faculty of the University of New Brunswick. In 1959 it was moved to Fredericton, to Somerville House, the former residence of the University's president, overlooking the St. John River. Overcrowding soon became a problem and, in 1968, the Faculty of Law received a permanent and fitting home on the University campus, Ludlow Hall, a gift of the Beaverbrook Foundation.

Appropriately, it was a representative of the Beaverbrook family, Lady Aitken, daughter-in-law of the longtime benefactor of both the University and the Faculty, Lord Beaverbrook, who declared Ludlow Hall officially open on October 8, 1968. In attendance were legal and political figures of international status. The papers delivered that day and the next form the basis for this issue.
