It gives me great pleasure to write a word of commendation upon the effort of the students of the Law School of the University of New Brunswick in venturing into the field of legal journalism.

For the students who contribute legal articles or notes upon cases it will prove a most valuable addition to their legal training. Writing legal articles will cultivate a student's ability to express himself precisely and in an accurate, meaningful and thorough manner. These are the requisites of a good factum for Courts of Appeal.

If students take advantage of such a medium to discuss current legal problems it will aid them in problem-thinking, that is to say, in dealing with new situations such as practicing lawyers are confronted with, which may not fall neatly within the framework of any of the courses taught at the Law School.

The editor of "Oyez-Oyez" has been fortunate in securing some excellent contributions by former students to his first publication, and these will be read with interest by all who follow the profession of the law.

I congratulate the promoters of "Oyez-Oyez" and extend my best wishes for its successful continuation.
